

Emilee Crowder

November 13, 2002

The Big Bad Wolf-Again!

Imagine me-the supposedly “Big Bad Wolf” being scared of a pig! It all started one week ago at The Animal’s Food Store. I was checking out and I had just shoved the change into my pocket when I heard the dreadful voice behind me. I didn’t recognize it at first, but then I figured it out. It squealed, “You don’t even count your change?” When I realized it was that know-it-all pig, I got mad and frightened at the same time. I was mad because of the burn that I got from falling down the chimney. It still hurts till this day. I was scared that he might do something else to me, so I just pulled out the change and pretended to count it. The embarrassing truth is, I don’t know how to count. My mom wasn’t healthy enough to stay home alone, so I couldn’t go to school. I had to stay and help her. I guess that’s part of the reason why I’m so “big” and “bad”. I tried to forget all about it.

The next day, when I was crossing the street, I heard the same voice. “Get on the crosswalk, can’t you see!” It was the pig. He was inside his brick car. I was wondering how it could move when I looked ahead. The crosswalk was about five feet away from me. I hurried over to it, and then finished walking across the street.

The last and final time I saw the smart pig was at the park. I was swinging when I noticed him taking a walk on the path. I quickly stopped because I didn’t want him to complain about me swinging. So I just shouted, “Hi.” I can’t believe I said that. As soon as I did, he noticed my shoes were untied. (Now you know why I feared that pig!) I realized I had to do something about him.

The next day, I stopped by his brick house. I knew the way from earlier experiences, so it wasn't hard to find. Before I rang the doorbell, I made sure I couldn't find anything wrong about me. When he opened the door, I shoved the flowers at him. (I had sprayed Forget-it-All on them. It is a type of spray to make animals notice fewer things.) Hopefully, that will make him notice only the most important things. He took them and I rushed home before he could say anything. I hope it works!

The End